Census – then and now

Special document display to feature 1790 census page
On March 17, in honor of the 21st Census, the National Archives in Washington, DC will display a page from the 1790 census (the nation's first) showing the name of revolutionary war hero Paul Revere. The special document display will be in the Rotunda of the National Archives Building through April 9.

Every 10 years since 1790, as required by the Constitution, the federal government takes a census of the American population. This decennial population count is the basis for apportioning each state's representation in the House of Representatives. April 1, 2000 is Census Day and marks the beginning of Census 2000, the 21st federal census. The U. S. Census Bureau expects to deliver more than 120 million census questionnaires to households in all 50 states and the District of Columbia, plus 1.6 million in United States territories.

The document displayed in Washington will be a page from the Boston, MA 1790 census, featuring Paul Revere in the middle column. The 1790 census

Ireland's Bluebeard

Lemeneagh Castle is a 17th century building with mullioned and transomed windows built on a 15th century tower. It stands on rising ground, outlined dramatically against the sky. This was once the home of Maire Rua (Mary of the Red Hair), reputedly Ireland's Bluebeard, an ugly woman who had no compunction about punishing her servants by hanging them from their hair for half an hour from the castle gargoyles.

Her husband, Conor O'Brien, was mortally wounded by the English in 1651. When stretcher-bearers brought him home, the fearsome Maire at first refused to admit them, bellowing from the ramparts, "We have no room here for dead men!" Persuaded that he was still alive, she finally allowed him in and nursed him until he died in the early hours. Then, his body barely cold, she rode off to Limerick where she offered to marry an English officer. She believed that by marrying a Protestant she could preserve her castle and lands for her son. A bold Cromwellian cornet called John Cooper took up her offer, but not long afterwards, as Maire helped him shave, the razor somehow slipped. She then married another Englishman, who was careless enough to stroll with her on the castle ramparts. Somehow, he fell to his death.

A third English husband accepted an invitation from Maire to ride her charger along the Cliffs of Moher. At a whistle from Maire, the horse raised itself on its hind legs and down into the Atlantic went the unfortunate man. Local tradition has it that Maire married 25 husbands in total, all of whom seemed to meet a violent fate. She got her comeuppance, however, when she evicted a poor widow from her cottage. Bent on revenge, the woman made her way to a group of "cursing stones" (a feature of that part of Clare) and, turning towards the castle, cursed Maire that she "may die roaring with legs in the air." A little later, when Maire was out hunting, her horse took fright and threw her into a hollow tree, where she ended up head down and legs in the air. When they found her, she was dead. Meeting News:

- ❖ A scrapbook was started during the tenure of Russell Tyson. Marie Swain has worked diligently to keep the clipping up-to-date. The scrapbook is filled with obituaries and will be available at monthly meetings for members' use. A special thanks goes to Russell, to Barbara Revels, and specially to Marie for all the work that has gone into this work. Marie is heading up the hospitality committee to provide refreshments for our joint April meeting.
- ❖ Gordon Basnight reports the transcription of the 1840 U. S. Census for Washington Co., NC, is almost complete.
- ❖ Barbara Revels has agreed to tackle transcribing items from old issues of the Roanoke Beacon.
- ❖ For the present, WCGS will meet in the Plymouth First FWB Church Fellowship Hall until further notice, with the exception of the April meeting. The church voted to allow the meetings except in the case of funerals or weddings. Later this year, we expect to meet with Tyrrell County on their regularly-scheduled meeting day.
- ❖ Members are asked to "show'n tell" – small family treasures and their related stories.
- ❖ Our April meeting will begin with a social period starting at 2 p.m., followed by introduction of guests. Mr. Dunstan will be introduced by Harry L. Thompson, curator of Port O'Plymouth Museum. Harry says Mr. Dunstan's topic may be researching in Bertie County. After the meeting, publications will be offered for purchase and there'll be time to visit with fellow historians and genealogists. The Washington County Historical Society is planning an event-filled week-end. The entire Living History Week-end will provide an many events of interest to young and old alike.
